CHANGED GLOVES.

They were sitting side by side on their way home from town. After they had discussed politics Bagshaw said, "It's my wife's birthday."

"You must wish her many happy returns of the day for me," said Atkinson. "I'm taking her home a little pres-ent," said Bagshaw modestly. He pointed to a small parcel which lay be-tween them. "Half a dozen of gloves." "Dear me, that's very strange! I am taking my wife half a dozen of gloves."

Mr. and Mrs. Bagshaw were a singularly united couple. Nelly was a dear little woman, and Bagshaw adored her. They never quarreled. Their lives were a little paradise, and they had been married two years. Bagshaw said he had brought her a little present. Then he put it on the table and modestly left the room, not wishing to see her overwhelmed with gratitude and surprise.

"Gloves!" she said delightedly. "Oh, you dear old boy! That's just what I wanted."

Then her face fell. They were the wrong size. Nellie had very little hands and wore size  $5\frac{1}{2}$ ; these were  $7\frac{1}{2}$ .

"Well," said her husband gayly as he re-entered the room, "are they all

"Do you know, you silly old boy, you've bought the wrong size? You must change them. I've got a small hand. "Wrong size! I bought 514."

"These are 7½," said Mrs. Bagshaw, with a superior smile. "It just shows how they take men in."
"But I know I got the right size," he said, looking very puzzled, "because 1 examined them carefully." Then a sudden light broke over his countenance. "Great Scott!" he said, with a look of horror. "I've given you the wrong par-

"You have given me the wrong parcel?" she said quietly. "What do you

Bagshaw looked as if he didn't know what he meant. "I am waiting for an explanation," she said, drawing up her small figure to its full height—when it measured nearly 5 feet.

"They are Mrs. Atkinson's," he said faintly.

"I don't think I know her," said his

"I'l tell you what I'll do," said Bag-shaw briskly. "I'll run over to Rich-mond now and give her the gloves. She has yours, you know." Mrs. Bagshaw gave him a look which would have killed a man with any de-cent feeling. "Don't trouble," she said. Bagshaw sat down and thought it all oyer. Of course he and Atkinson had, somebow or other, exchanged parcels in the train. It was very tiresome, but no great harm was done.

In the meanwhile the outraged wife had gone to her room. First of all, she sat down and cried at her husband's treachery, then she got up and laughed rather hysterically at the size of the other woman's hand.

Now, Mr. Atkinson was a careful man, and he had scribbled on his parcel, "Atkinson, Laurel Cottage, the Terrace, Richmond."

She would go straight to this disgraceful Atkinson woman with the enormous hands—Mrs. Bagshaw positively shook with horror when she thought of the size of Mrs. Atkinson's hands—and find out all about it. Then she would go home to her mother. There was just time to eatch a train.

She scribbled a note for her husband and left it on the dressing table. "I am leaving you," it ran. "I shall never forgive you. I shall go first to this woman and give her your present. Then I shall go home."

Events now followed each other rapidly. Bagshaw found the note and trembled. While he was still trembling and before he could decide what to do next a knock at the front door was heard. It was Mr. Atkinson.

"Do you know you took the wrong gloves?" he said rather sharply. "These are too small, and my wife was very annoyed with me about it." " said Bagshaw

"My wife has gone to see feelingly. your wife on the subject," he continued.
"I think there will be unpleasantness." Bagshaw explained what had happened and showed the note.

"It's quite clear," said Mr. Atkinson, with much dignity, "that these women have treated us very badly. We have not met with becoming confidence."

"I quite agree with you," said Bagshaw, beginning to pluck up a little Your wife has threatened to leave you; my wife has threatened to leave We'll treat them the same way. We'll run up to town, go to a theater, have supper in the Strand and get home at 1 o'clock in the morning. That will teach them to talk about leaving us." Just as they reached the railway station and were about to take their tickets, a train came in from Richmond. Two ladies got out and met them face to face.

Half an hour's chat had satisfied the ladies that there was no need for them to be alarmed about their respective lords and masters, and they had become very good friends. The two ladies felt rather crestfallen.

When Mr. Bagshaw saw his wife standing in front of him, he lost his nerve. His face went pale, he stared at her helplessly and let the opera glasses fall to the ground.

"Where are you going, Percy?" said Mrs. Bagshaw in the sweetest possible

"Yes, Charlie, where are you going?" said Mrs. Atkinson.

"My dear," said her husband slowly and impressively, "we were just going to take the train to Richmond to apologize to you two ladies for our mistake about the gloves."

The two ladies glanced at the opera glasses and at one another. Then, without any further explanation, they all went up to Bagshaw's house to spend the evening. - London Tit-Bits.

THE CORSET AGAIN.

Still Flourishing In Spite of Obloquy-X Ray Revelations.

The corset is again the victim-or object —of anathema. How many generations have condemned it, how much obloquy it has endured, and how well it still flourishes! There are certain plants that grow the better for being trampled upon, and it would almost seem that the corset is more firmly fixed in fashionable affection for being abused. Of course so long standing a quarrel is not likely to be soon decided.

The latest enemy of the corset is the X ray. This insidious foe has revealed all sorts of enormities in the human frame divine, said enormities being entirely due to this cherished article of attire. Everybody is horrified at the revelations made by the scientific photographs, but everybody will go on wearing a corset just the same, just as people are well aware that certain artieles of food are indigestible, unwholesome, even positively hurtful, yet the market for such comestibles does not fail. When it is a question between looking pretty inside and looking pretty outside, the latter condition is sure to be preferred every time.

Today's illustration shows a charming costume of pearl gray cloth. The skirt is cut away at the foot over a wide bias band of sapphire blue velvet headed by applications of rosettes of old point. The short, straight bolero of sapphire velvet is trimmed with similar rosettes and opens over a chemisette of white and pale blue broche silk. The tight sleeves of gray cloth have a chain sette of white and paic blue broche silk. The tight sleeves of gray cloth have a small pufe at the top. The plaited collar and crossed corselet are of blue velvet. The valois collar is lined with lace. The blue velvet toque is trimmed with blue plumes and pink velvet flowers.

JUDIC CHOLLET.

The History of Tacitus.

The entire history of Tacitus, as we have the work, was regained from a single copy found in the fifteenth century in a monastery of Westphalia. That we should owe the works of this author to one copy is a remarkable circumstance, for the Emperor Tacitus, who claimed to be a descendant of the historian, had copies of the history placed in every library of the empire, and each year had ten copies transcribed for presentation to scholars. All, it seems, perished save the Westphalian cesy.
